Greening's frog is mostly found in forests in Brazil. It was first described in 1896. It is unusual because the frog lives in tree holes. The small dark green animal has a massive flat head. The bones of the head have the form of a helmet covered with spines. To hide in their homes, Greening's frogs close the entrance to their holes with the helmet. This trick protects the frog from big animals and prevents it from losing much water. It is not easy to pull the frog from its hole. When attacked, the spines on the head become poisonous. Eating Greening's frog is like eating a poisonous cactus. The frog's poison is dangerous to humans too.
